sured the anxious so of late, and-" old lady that the writer was quite happy; that there was really no necessity for worry, and that mamma might make herself quite content at Biarritz. Geoffrey was the best of husbands, and although of course away from the stifling atmosphere of much engaged at South Kensington with his fearfully abstruse experiments, and his new book on "Steel Fibers," he was extremely attentive and kind. And she was, with much love, mamma's affectionate daughter, Helen Waterhouse. "Mamma won't believe it," said young Mrs. Waterhouse, with a kind away, if you remember-" Thank goodness, there isn't one!"

On the clean blotting-pad was an impress of some of her husband's writing. A pilette-shaped mirror stood on the table, and, half unconsciously, she turned the pad toward it

"Wonder to whom he has been writing?"

It was quite easy to see. Mrs. spare. Moreover, it occurred to her Waterhouse glanced at it casually at that she could be quite as bitter in a first; then, her face fiercely pink, well-composed letter, to be dispatched with much attention:

Professor Waterhouse, with concern -"that's very true, and it must never get known. I can't drop the affair now, unfortunately; but, you know-" he smiled at his wife a little anxiously -"there is no harm in it, and I'm not the only man who-"

"Really?" In a tone of remote and frigid interest. 'I frankly admit, though, that I should be very sorry for it to get known. Of course, it seems to you a very foolish thing to do."

"By no means." "But I really don't believe that I could have endured the strain of writing that new work of mine if, at the same time, I had not-"

"Geoffrey, I won't listen to you." "Well, my dear, I can't force you to, can I? I believe, if you would only let me tell you the whole affair from beginning to end, you wouldn't be so much annoyed about it. It really isn't so bad as you think. Alicia is a most delightful girl, and it The letter as- know; and I have been alogging away has been a recreation for me, you

The door slammed. Mrs. Waterhouse went upstairs to her room and hurriedly, very burriedly, packed a portmanteau. There was time to catch the mail at Charing Cross, and she meant to catch it. The great thing was to get away to Biarritz, this house, away from London. She rang for her maid.

"Parker."

"Yes, ma'am," "The mail goes at 8 from Charing Cross, I think?"

"It used to go at 8, ma'am," said

Parker, cautiously. "When we went of comic despair. "She is always "Yes, yes, of course. I want you wanting to know about the skeleton. to pack a bag for yourself and we will catch the mail to-night."

"Catch the mail, ma'am, to-night?" "Yes, yes. Lose no time please, and send out for a cab."

"Well, I never!" murmured Parker. Mrs. Waterhouse had some intention of having one fine, big, square scene with her husband before she left, but there was little time to from Biarritz, as in a hasty interview.

"Come along, Parker," she called, that I am quite true to you. I am bound by certain ties to others, but along. "It's all very well to say come along." muttered Parker, disconto you, my sweetheart, my own deargame, and I don't 'alf cotton to it."

"We'll get in now, Parker," said Mrs. Waterhouse. "There's twenty minutes to wait, but we may as well take our seats. Seconds, please, porter."

They found comfortable corner seats. For a while they watched the stout, perspiring ladies and the slim much when she saw two Frenchmen kiss each other that she dropped the Lady's Own Chatterbox. Mrs. Waterhouse took it up and held it in her hand. "I must read," she whispered to herself. "I must do something to keep myself from thinking. I shall faint if I don't divert my thoughts." The Lady's Own Chatterbox lay on her lap. She put one small foot against the seat opposite, and leaned electric light on the page. "Any more going on?" cried the in-spector on the platform, aggressively. "We commence this week a story by a new writer. Walter House, entitled "Alicia's Only Love." It will be replete with romantic interest, and in short, a wonderful picture of highclass life of the present day, with all its faults and foibles."

"Now then," cried the inspector on the platform, in an aggrieved tone to a belated passenger, "are you going on there, or are you not going on?"

Mrs. Waterhouse began to read. Chapter I was headed "The Countess." "Alicia was half-leaning, half-reclining on an ottoman reading a delicately-scented letter from Sir Harold de Beer. It opened thus: 'I want you, my dearest, to believe that I am quite true to you. I am bound by certain ties to others, but to you, my sweetheart, my own darling Alicia-" "Parker!" screamed Mrs. Waterhouse, with a gusp of delight, "Come out quickly." "Right away," shouted the inspector. "Stand away there, please."

"Here, stop!" cried Mrs. Water-

She caught up her skirts and jumped nimbly out. An active porter seized the bags, and, as the train was moving, caught the descending Parker neatly and swung her around upon her feet.

"'Ow's that, um pire?" asked the porter. "O-u-t, out," said the inspector. He turned his hand-lamp to Mrs. Waterhouse. "Hope you're all right,
